BULLDOG BARRISTERS.

In a recent number of the Melbourne Argus appeared a "leader" dealing with a little practice in the Australian law courts, which, although very common, wants to be kicked out by some man to whom shoe leather is not a consideration. The article is founded on a letter represented to have been sent to that paper by one Aiguillon de Gueppe, three columns long, and written wholly in the French language. Aiguillon is said to speak strongly on the latitude indulged in by examining and cross-examining barristers in our courts. He thinks they set themselves to insult and intimidate witnesses, and asserts that if such things were done in his sunny land someone would punch a hole in the legal gentleman's head. Of course Aiguillon is a myth, and his three columns of stricture a convenient imaginary peg on which to hang a bristling satire. The practice is not confined to Victoria. Elsewhere, as well as there, notoriety pays, and the bullier is reputed clever. Witnesses have asscended the box under the pressure of a high sense of duty, and without the slightest personal interest in the issue of the case. The opposing barrister is quite justified in taking legitimate means to shake the evidence. But the practice is not to rest with legitmate means. Like a ferret he creeps through every avenue of the witness's character, and if only he can find a knuckle of the vertabræ of a dead rabbit he is vastly proud, and the yokels spitting about the galleries are mightily gratified, To those at a distance from Australian law courts the following may appear to be a burlesque, but to those whom business likely to pass as a current history. The matter is a dog-fight, and a witness, who is a lady, has to testify that she saw one of the men in the dock leading a tan-colored bulldog in the direction of where the fight took place.

Barrister: You are Mrs.-Mrs.-Mrs. Witness: Mrs. Jones.

B.: Ha, yes; Mrs. Jones. And how long are you Mrs. Jones?

W.: Ten years. B.: Ha, yes. And before that you were Miss-Miss-Miss

W .: Miss Brown. B.: Ha, yes. And what age were you then? W.: 29.

B.: Ha, yes. Now, on your oath, was Mr. Jones your first lover? Think of what you're about. Eh?

W.: Y-e-s.

B.: Come, come. You may have blinded other people; you're not going to blind us. Did you never know a Mr. Smith?

B.: What! never knew a Mr. Smith? We all know Mr. Smiths. Very honorable men, all of them, and a little partial to the sex. Eh? Policeman: Soilence in the Coort! His Honor: If there's any more laughing, I'll order these people to be removed.

Proceed, Mr. Barrister. B.: Well, well, Mrs. Jones, we all have skeletons in our cupboards, and, as there is a Mr. Jones in the field now, we'll not ask you to explain any further on that point. But you swear you saw the prisoner pass you in the evening. Now, where were you at the time? W.: Standing at the garden gate. B.: Ha, you are willing to speak the truth sometimes. We know how you like to spend your evenings. You have heard the song of "Over the garden wall," eh? Just so. Now, why were you at the gate that evening? W.: I was expecting my husband.

B.: Indeed. Well, you swear that it wasn't an hour Lefore your husband leaves his office, eh? You won't? No? Oh, yes, it was somewhere about the time. Attend to me, now. Remember you are on your oath. Was there a Mr. Smith about? W.: No, sir.

B.: What! No Mr. Smith! What is the world coming to? Why, I can't go out of the door but I see a Mr. Smith. The town is full of them. The Court is full of them; and here you tell us that you, standing for an hour at the garden gate, "in the gloaming, in the gloaming," never saw

Crown Presecutor: I think, Your Honor

this examination is irrelevent. His Honor: I can't say until I see what he is wanting to bring out. And so it goes on, and when it is over, it is found that Mr. Barrister had nothing to bring out, for he had never heard anything of her past life. But he has satisfied his own notion of being able, and has made the yokels call him lively and a terror for the other side. His hide is too thick to feel any sympathy for the confusion and pain he has caused. There is such a thing as carrying order and deceney too far. Order and decency oblige the sufferers to abide by such protection as the Court affords. But if the Court will persist in remaining passive, as it habitually does, and will only rule the examination irrelevent after the thorns are all sown, our brother is brought up for cudgelling the or they will be torever barred. head of the wigged blackguard the punishment should not go beyond a nominal fine. -Sydney Bulletin.
